Too Much Grief.
(From Texas Sittings.)
"What's the news in your town?"
"Well, nothing much except that the Widow Shockers ran away with a barber."
"With a barber?"
"Yes, and a nigger at that, as black as the ace of spades."
"You don't say so. How do you suppose she came to do that?"
"I can't say, unless, perhaps, it is because she is wearing black yet for her husband. I guess she wanted to preserve the uniformity by running away with a negro instead of a white man."

ADAMS & CO.

After the Battle.

In the retreat the Colonel's headquarters wagon was missing, so they were all without rations, save a stray hardtack or slice of bacon that some provident man still retained in his saddle pocket, says a writer in Blue and Gray. An incident occurred here that I shall never forget, and I should like to know the name of the man and where he is now. As I lay there, weary and in pain, hungry and thirsty, with no prospect of anything to eat before the morning, if then, some one bent over me, I looked up and recognized my captor, behind whom I had ridden off the field. He held in one hand a hardtack, on which was a small piece of bacon; in the other a tin cup of hot coffee. As he handed it to me he said: "Here, pard, you are as hungry as I am, and I will divide with you." Was there ever an act that more fully denoted the true soldier? To deny himself that he might relieve the suffering of one who but three hours before would have killed him in the line of duty, or whom he would have killed, but now, being in his power, sought to show him every courtesy consistent with his duty! With him, and with all such as he, hostility ceased with surrender.
